Joint press release by the Federal Ministry for Environment and the Federal Environment Agency

First-time award of national Ecodesign prize

Award ceremony at Federal Ministry for Environment

On 22 November 2012 the Federal Ministry for Environment and the Federal Environment Agency conferred the awards of the national Ecodesign prize (Bundespreis Ecodesign) for the first time. Federal Environment Minister Peter Altmaier opened the ceremonial event at the Federal Ministry for Environment. Prizes were conferred on fourteen winners in the categories 'product', 'concept' and 'next generation'. The subject of the projects ranged from neighbourhood car-sharing to innovative hybrid technology and zero-emissions living to the reduction of junk data on the Internet.

In his speech, Federal Environment Minister Peter Altmaier emphasised, "Up to 80% of a product's environmental impact is determined in the design phase. We have launched this contest to uncover the creative potential that exists to improve the ecological quality of products - and how ambitious design, aesthetics and environmental protection can be united. Congratulations to all prize winners who have shown outstanding examples of this."

From the pool of 300 submissions, 51 projects in the contest categories 'product', 'concept' and 'next generation' were nominated for the national Ecodesign prize. The innovativeness, quality of design and consideration of the environment ultimately convinced the jury to select 14 projects. The prize winners' names were announced at the award ceremony in the Federal Ministry for Environment. Federal Environment Minister Peter Altmaier and Jochen Flasbarth, President of the Federal Environment Agency, conferred the prizes on the winners.

The jury chairman, Prof. Günter Hornrich (Designer, Professor for Design and Ecology at the Köln International School of Design, KISD), praised the impressive range and quality of the submissions during his speech. He said they demonstrate an in-depth understanding of design and that the ideas of ecodesign have become reality and a fixed part of the design process. The Federal Ministry for Environment and the Federal Environment Agency sponsored the contest in collaboration with the International Design Center Berlin (IDZ).
